Two unplanned outages have stopped ISU students from using Blackboard on two subsequent Sunday evenings: March 31 and April 5.

The outages that users experienced during these times were not from Blackboard itself, but derived from an internal issue at ISU Information Technology offices.

"During any outage, multiple ITS staff members are working feverishly to correct the problem, because we know users are being negatively impacted," said Jim Twetten, director of academic technologies at Information Technology Services.

Details of ISU violations surface

By Alex.Halsted
@iowastatedaily.com

Iowa State made violations that "constitute a major infractions case as a whole," it revealed in a document released Wednesday.

The document released to the Daily details 1,484 impermissible calls made between 2008-11 during recruiting. The violations, according to the report, took place across all 18 of Iowa State's varsity sports.

The ISU athletic department placed itself on two-year probation in November 2011, said it has or will invest more than $82,000 during the next three years in compliance and recruiting software and will impose call bans for various teams and coaches.

The investigation began in April 2011 after ISU men's basketball coach Fred Hoiberg became aware of improper contact with prospective recruits by coach Keith Moore while attending his son's basketball game. That night Hoiberg notified ISU Athletic Director Jamie Pollard of the potential violation.

In addition to Moore, the report names current assistant football coaches Shane Burnham and Bill Bleil, former football assistant coaches Luke Wells and Bob Elliott and former assistant basketball coach Daniyal Robinson for acknowledging involvement.

The enforcement staff initially examined the in-

Former FarmHouse member shares story

By Ryan.Anderson
@iowastatedaily.com

Coming out as a homosexual can be a difficult time for many. For one Iowa State student, coming out to his fraternity brothers resulted in a change in fraternities all together.

Tyler Mootz, senior in music, and an openly gay man, left FarmHouse fraternity because members made him feel unaccepted.

To become deactivated from a fraternity, the member must write a letter to the chapter. It must be read out loud in front of the chapter or another member must be chosen to read it.

Mootz chose to read it in front of the entire chapter and declare his unspoken feelings about how he was treated.

"I was never looking to be treated as the 'gay guy,' but rather like another brother. I should never have been afraid to tell any of you guys. You're my brothers; I should have felt safest telling you," Mootz said in his speech to deactivate from FarmHouse.

"After greek getaway [in high school], I went to the recruitment events for FarmHouse; I liked the recruitment chairs and really hit it off," Mootz said.

He joined and moved into the house fall 2009, his freshman year. The second semester of freshman year, Mootz realized that he was gay.

"I didn't know I was gay, but I knew I

Iowa bill could hold parents, adults accountable for minors

By Stanley.Ihejirika
@iowastatedaily.com

Incidents have been reported all over Iowa of underage drinking going wrong and of teens drinking and driving.

"I let my son go to a party that he told me was just a get-together of some friends. My son drank underage and got alcohol poisoning," said Carmelita Collins, mother of a University of Iowa student.

"I support this bill because adults and minors both have to learn to take responsibility for the actions they take. We as adults have to be more vigilant about what our children are doing up until they are [at] the age of adulthood," Collins said.

Reports of underage drinking concern many. A bill introduced last year could start holding parents responsible for giving their children alcohol.

First Amendment Day

LoMonte covers free speech

By Lissandra.Villa
@iowastatedaily.com

Religion, assembly, petition, press and speech. These are the five rights guaranteed by the First Amendment, which will be celebrated on First Amendment Day on Thursday.

Various events have been leading up to First Amendment Day this week, including the lecture Social Media and the First Amendment by Frank LoMonte, executive director of the Student Press Law Center. LoMonte presented in Memorial Union's Great Hall on Wednesday.

"I really am in awe of the way that Iowa State opens its heart to the First Amendment for this whole week once a year," LoMonte said.

LoMonte presented various First Amendment cases to demonstrate how law is not keeping up with social media as developments occur.

"Now, the internet has so compressed what we think of as a generation. What is a generation now? A generation is the 18 months between iPhone three and iPhone four," LoMonte said.

During the lecture, LoMonte made the point that the First Amendment arises in court as a defense of someone overreaching his or her boundaries.

LoMonte said that not knowing what rights the First Amendment protects can lead to self-censorship.

"If you're not sure where the line exists, then you'll stop yourself way short of the line," LoMonte said.

More than 250 people were present for the lecture, after which LoMonte took questions from the audience.

"Understanding how broad our rights are, I think that's taken for granted a lot of times," said Peter Gensler, a junior in supply chain management. "We have a lot of ways to express ourselves, it's just a matter of whether we want to exercise them and use them."

LoMonte also spoke about how every new media that has been invented since the creation of the First Amendment has faced the same challenges that social media are dealing with today.

He also addressed the changes in constitutional rights over time.

"Students are the one demographic group in America whose constitutional rights are worse today than they were 40 years ago," LoMonte said.

Frank LoMonte

He went on to add that everyone has a stake in students having a right to free speech because college students are the frontline providers of news.

LoMonte stated that he believes news consumption as well as First Amendment rights should be taught as a core class in middle school.

The lecture was sponsored by the Greenlee School of Journalism and Communication, the Iowa State Daily, Lee Enterprises, the ISU chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists, and the Committee on Lectures funded by the Government of the Student Body.

was different from a young age," Mootz said.

Being in a fraternity, he knew coming out to a house full of men was going to be challenging. Due to these challenges, Mootz eventually left the fraternity in spring 2011.

Mootz first came out to Derek Lacina, senior in mechanical engineering, his pledge dad and roommate at the time.

"It didn't bother me at all," said Lacina, an alumnus of FarmHouse said.

Lacina said that some members did treat Mootz a little different after he came out. While mean or derogatory things were never said to him, he was more avoided than anything else, Lacina said.

"I didn't come out to people who would have an issue with it," Mootz said.

Mootz gives some FarmHouse members credit for breaking him out of his shell and becoming his real self.

One fraternity member said to Mootz, "It doesn't matter what you do with your life," after he discovered Mootz was in a homosexual relationship.

This helped Mootz feel more comfortable coming out to others.

"There's a lot of people who come in who have never seen a gay person before. They would be somewhat mortified and mystified," said Nate Witzel, junior in mechanical engineering and president of FarmHouse.

When Mootz returned to school in the fall, he could tell that there was a big change in how he was being treated at the house.

"It got to the point where I just felt a complete disconnect from the house; I didn't feel welcome there anymore, nobody asked me to do anything," Mootz said.

While Mootz decided his course of action, he was in the process of making an amendment to the chapter bylaws because they did not have a nondiscrimination policy against people based on sexual orientation.

"Traditionally and extremely stereo-typically fraternities are going to be more conservative," Witzel said.

There is still no bylaw prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation for FarmHouse Fraternity.

"Being a private organization, we can discriminate on anything we wanted, simply from a legal standpoint. A lot of the by-laws are written from a legal standpoint," Witzel said.

Mootz is a current member of Kappa Kappa Psi.

formation using what it called a "trigger call." With that standard, explained in the report as "no contemporaneous documentation of the call," there would have been 33 coaches and 1,405 impermissible calls.

The standard of a trigger call, "in order to mitigate the large number of potential involved individuals," was changed to a call longer than two minutes, which shortened the list to six coaches.

The report filed with the NCAA in November 2011 shows that 962 impermissible calls were made by the ISU football staff, including staff members from the programs of both Gene Chizik and Paul Rhoads. Elliot, who currently coaches at Notre Dame, made 199 of those calls.

Men's basketball represents the second largest number of improper calls with 147, and Moore sent 160 impermissible text messages between August 2010 and August 2011.

The majority of the impermissible calls were for failure to log after no contact was made with a recruit. Out of the 962 impermissible calls made by the football staff, 810 were due to logging issues.

In all, Iowa State said 1,260 impermissible calls were due to logging issues.

The investigation reviewed more than 750,000 calls made during the three-year period from all 69 coaches.

The ISU athletic department concluded that, "The university believes it has conducted a thorough inquiry and has imposed appropriate corrective and punitive actions." Those actions include the two-year probation and specific call bans listed in the report for individual teams and coaches.

For football, the call bans included, "Five weeks of no telephone calls by all coaching staff members [and reducing] official visits by 20 percent from the four-year average."

Iowa State has asked the NCAA to consider that the institution responded "rapidly" and "produced very little, if any, recruiting advantage" due to the impermissible calls.

doctorate from the University of Wisconsin in business with an emphasis on finance and real estate.

Sa-Aadu was a finalist that was nominated for candidacy, “I was nominated, but I do not know who nominated me. My understanding is that several people nominated me.”

Sa-Aadu said Iowa State is one of the best public universities in the nation.

“I am attracted by the collaborations among the colleges that are already in place,” Sa-Aadu said. “The educational assets and programs assembled by the College of Business, and of course the university as a whole are very attractive to me.”

“I see an opportunity to work collaboratively with all faculty, staff, students, alumni and the community, to not only raise the research and teaching profile of the faculty but also the profile of the college as a whole which should culminate in branding the college.”

Throughout his speech Sa-Aadu spoke about different strategic plans that he had for the College of Business and how it would effect the college as a whole.

“My key strategy in propelling the college forward [it] involves broad engagement with stakeholders and forming strategic partnerships. ... My focus is on strengthening the reputation [of the college],” Sa-Aadu said.

Sa-Aadu described his knowledge of the College of Business in his speech and told of the things that could be done by any dean that would take the position to improve the college itself.

“I do not see anything broken as such, on the contrary, I think one can make a case that the College of Business probably is better than its reputation,” Sa-Aadu said.

“And therefore, the job of any dean coming here ... is stepping back and looking at the assets that are in place, trying to identify what are some of those key attributes that we can use to differentiate the program.”

Sa-Aadu talked about the challenges the College of Business could face in the future and challenges in general that would have to be overcome in order to succeed.

“At the end of the day the way we are going to be ... evaluated has to do not so much with the challenges that we face, but rather how we transform those challenges,” Sa-Aadu said.

the office of the senior vice president and provost, hopes that all three videos of the three finalists will be posted on the provost's website by noon Thursday.

The open forums for all three candidates, “were very well attended, they went very well. It was an appropriate topic, and a good turnout and good questions,” Bratsch-Prince said.

Individuals can watch the videos and fill out an evaluation form for all three candidates. Those who have attended the open forums are also encouraged to fill out an evaluation form.

“We are going to collect all the evaluated information then the search committee will meet again and we'll sit down and have a conversation with all of the input from the different stakeholders and from the evaluation forms,” Bratsch-Prince said.

“We hope to have the process concluded by the end of the semester.”

Groups such as the Alliance of Coalitions for Change are pushing for a social host law that would prohibit adults from allowing minors to consume alcohol.

They are also looking to expand Iowa's minor-in-possession law to include consumption as well as possession.

House File 396 was introduced last year but hasn't advanced very far. It embodies a social host law as well as barring minors from consuming alcohol.

With a few amendments, the bill would extend to parents, college roommates, or any adults who allow minors to drink on their property or under their supervision. They would be facing a misdemeanor and could face fines if caught.

“Social host ordinances have been adopted in several

Alcohol law

A person of legal age who permits underage consumption or possession of alcohol in violation of the proposed law would commit a serious misdemeanor punishable by a minimum fine of $500.

H.F. 396 would exempt parents who might allow an underaged child to consume wine, beer or liquor in their private home but would cover other underaged friends at a residence, house party or outdoor gathering on farms or other properties.

cities. We are trying to expand these ordinances all over Iowa. The bill was passed out of the public safety committee, but hasn't made any more progress this year,” said State Representative, Tom Shaw.

“We have drafted an amendment that would make the bill stronger, but there are still too many concerns with the bill.”

The state's current law of underage drinking only covers physical possession of an alcoholic beverage. If the bill is expanded to consumption it means a minor could be charged with a violation if they fail a breath or blood test.

“Underage drinking has not really increased on campus. The community and officers have been working cohesively to crack down on underage drinking. Liquor law violations and citations have increased while other crimes have decreased,” said Lt. Elliott Florer.

“Outreach programs and police are doing better to modify behavior when it comes to underage drinking and other crimes. The community has really been assisting the police as phone calls are going up about 2,000 for the past five to six years.”

EDITORIAL:

Small steps can improve larger world

Beyond the chief justice's administration of the oaths of office for the president, vice president and new members of the Government of the Student Body Senate each year, the GSB Supreme Court does almost nothing.

This month, the court has a unique opportunity to make a ruling that could affect some students. Monday, now-former GSB President Jared Knight vetoed a bill passed by the GSB Senate at last Wednesday's meeting. The bill would have funded a "Meet Your Government Day" at which students could eat with and meet and talk with members of GSB.

The problem with the veto (and reason for the case) is that since Knight vetoed it on Monday, the day the newly-elected Senate was to be sworn in, the Senate that originally passed the bill did not have enough time to meet to potentially override the veto.

The scope of the case is small, and the issue deals with some of the finer points of GSB procedure, but that the GSB Supreme Court should be doing something is important. An especially active court that always met would be a bad thing, because that would mean that GSB is a litigious organization, but at the same time, holding the distinction of being a member of the GSB Supreme Court should not be a sinecure.

For the first time in three years, the GSB Supreme Court has issued an opinion and agreed to hear a case. Since voter turnout in GSB elections is dismally low (this year, less than 10 percent of the student body voted in the elections for GSB) and few students speak out about how their activity fees are being spent, it is safe to say that perhaps the biggest news here is that GSB even has a court, that it is not simply a legislative branch and an executive branch.

Having opportunities to improve their sphere of influence (or world) is a good thing. Although the dark side of such opportunities is that their world is less than perfect. Having such opportunities, however, is a good thing for everyone. Enjoying our adventures at Iowa State allows us to practice having an adventure at all, so that we are capable of making our adult, post-college worlds a good place.

Too often, we surrender to outside pressure to conform to outdated traditions that no longer serve a constructive purpose, do not question rules that have outlived their usefulness or think that "respect" equates to unthinking acceptance of what other people have to say.

Conveniently, today is the annual First Amendment Day celebration at Iowa State (even though, like other constitutional provisions that acknowledge rights, first amendment day is every day). It is precisely through exercising our rights to act — and, in our political system, exercising the right to speak and converse and collaborate is most important — that we effect the kind of change that makes a difference.

GSB is a small pond. The GSB Supreme Court is an even smaller pond. But where improving the world is concerned, size does not matter. What matters is making an honest effort to improve the way in which we interact with one another and to improve the lives of the people around us.

Politics

The Republican party holds to specific ideals and beliefs, such as religious agendas and lower taxes across the board, that will eventually contribute to the collapse of the party if they do not find a better way to accomplish their goals, Daily columnist Michael Glawe writes.

Policy changes can fix GOP

Last week, I promised I would deliver a list of comprehensive policy reforms that could be adopted by the Republican Party in order to breathe life into their political credibility. In this column, I detail my suggestions.

It must be prefaced, however, that the survival of these measures is entirely contingent upon the courage of "normal" Republicans to break free from the chains placed upon them by the extremist fringe groups that carried the party through the 2010 midterm elections.

Distancing themselves from the Tea Party and fundamentalist factions (who quite regularly foment mass hysteria and racial anxiety — techniques used by Robert Welch and W. Cleon Skousen) should be the salient objective of centrist Republicans looking to take back the GOP.

(As a foreword, I apologize if I don't delve into the complexities of some of these issues.)

The first issue that the Republican Party should rethink is abortion. The "pro-life movement," can stand by itself without the edification of religion (allow the humanists to take up the fight!). Medical research has shown that the point of viability is shifting (down to 20 weeks). Though less than 1 percent of all abortions occur after 20 weeks, research in embryology has strengthened the case for the concept of "unborn child."

By Michael Glawe
@iowastatedaily.com

There is room for the GOP to argue that we as a society have the responsibility to consider the "unborn child," at the point of its possible survival outside the womb, a real human. But, as Christopher Hitchens notes in his book, "God Is Not Great," religious opposition to contraceptives could severely degrade arguments against abortion (they are not moral equivalents).

Another policy that should be reconsidered is taxes. Since when did raising tax rates become political suicide for Republicans? Grover Norquist and his cronies can take the blame. Taxes need to be higher than where they are now, especially with an aging population (with needed deliberations on entitlement reform). As a Journal for Economic Perspectives paper suggests, the optimal tax rate on the highest income earners should be around 70 percent!

There are no rational arguments against raising taxes, and the claim that the top earners are the job creators is unsubstantiated. And, as Nobel Prize winner

Paul Krugman stated, "I think there are a lot more important moral issues in the world than defending the right of the rich to keep their money, but whatever."

The high priority of the security of our country is good policy, but this can be achieved with less defense spending, especially wasteful defense spending. It shouldn't be seen as unpatriotic to fix this problem, either.

Islamic extremism in the Middle East and its influence on religious fanaticism is a real threat. Combating this is a cause for the GOP, but taking that cause to supererogatory lengths makes you look like Joseph McCarthy or an Islamophobe.

Supporting economic competition is healthy, but that doesn't mean the government should allow the market to be completely "free" (purely free markets should not exist). Regulations are not used for "tyrannical" purposes, but for preserving capitalism. Bridging the gap between regulators and businessmen and women is a must.

Republicans can be debt hawks when we've successfully reduced unemployment. We had a chance to pay down our national debt during the Bush years. That time has come and passed. Responsible spending is something the Republicans can always advocate for.

Keynesian economics wins over austerity. There is too much evidence suggesting that fiscal consolidation causes contraction. Data on the policies of 27 different countries during Great Depression shows us that fiscal and monetary stimulus is more effective than austerity. Republicans, stop advocating for austerity during a recession.

Also, shouldn't conservatives be in support of environmental protection (conserving air, water, soil, etc.)? Cap and trade was, after all, birthed by the GOP, and Nixon created the EPA.

Lastly, Republicans need to stop pushing legislation that advances religious teachings (especially teachings that interfere with science). Our government is, and always has been, secular.

In addition, most of whom we consider "Founding Fathers" (Jefferson, Washington, Franklin, Paine, etc.) were not even "religious." They were, more accurately, Deists, pantheists and even atheists.

One cannot stress enough the intent of the first amendment (best explained in Article 11 of the Treaty of Tripoli).

These policy changes are predicated upon what I advocated for in my last column. Rational-thinking individuals must retake the reins of the GOP. If they fail, their divided house will not stand.

Freedom

All but one: right to assemble neglected

While I have been spoiled with four of the five freedoms given to citizens in the First Amendment, the freedom to assemble is not always what it is "cracked up" to be, compared to the freedom of speech, religion, the press and petition. Though these four have been very beneficial, the freedom of assembly has not always been practiced in my life. Therefore, some would say I could live without it.

The freedom to assemble peaceably has not been respected throughout my life. The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting ... or prohibiting the free exercise thereof ... the right of the people to peaceably assemble." Though no laws have been made to stop assembly, the prejudice assumption, known as racial profiling, has broken up some of the small gatherings that I've had. When a group of African-American boys are together, many people consider the group to be "thugs" or a "clique," which both have very negative connotations. This often leads to bystanders calling the police, and the police breaking up the group of guys because of a judgmental observation.

This has happened to me on numerous occasions. I was gathered together with a group of people at a local park, enjoying the weather, shooting some hoops and catching up with some old friends I had not seen in awhile. A police car stopped at the park and two police officers approached our group. The police officers questioned us about what we all were "really" doing; accusing us of smoking weed at the park and asking us to empty our pockets. This supports my beliefs about a weak freedom to assemble because none of the people at the park had any marijuana and none were arrested for possession of an illegal substance, but we all were wrongfully accused of exercising illegal practices.

As a young child, my siblings and I went to a local store to buy some supplies and food. We didn't feel comfortable because we continuously had to look over our shoulders as we witnessed a secret shopper following us through the store. Before we could even buy our things, the man accused us of stealing and held us in the store until the police came. We eventually were kicked out of the store, embarrassed, because we had the money to pay for what we needed. This happened because a group of "suspicious-looking" kids were walking through a store, but what made us suspicious?

My life depicts what it is like without the freedom of assembly. What if everyone in the United States was put in this position on a regular basis? My understanding of this part of the amendment is that people should be able to come together without being hassled by a stereotypical assumption that represents some of the African-American community. I also believe that no ethnic or cultural group should be penalized because they are in the minority or in political opposition to those in authority.

Being allowed freedom to express myself through many written forms (speech), to believe in whatever faith and tolerating others who don't (religion), to write the truth in our publication no matter the controversy (press) and uniting with others who want to oppose something (petition) are just some of the privileges that have been positive in my life. Yet the First Amendment cannot be completely exercised until all the citizens make use of every freedom in the amendment.

Anson Woodin, senior in finance, plays Tevye in the Stars Over Veishea production of “Fiddler on the Roof,” which will be performed at Fisher Theater.

By Liz Cleaveland
Ames247 writer

“Fiddler on the Roof” is the performance of choice for this year’s Stars Over Veishea. Having reeled in numerous Tony Awards and holding the record for the longest-running show on Broadway for 10 years, this classic is full of universal themes.

But just how did Stars Over Veishea get its start? Formerly known as the Nite Show that began in 1923, this 90-year-old tradition changed its name when the location of performances used to be held in Clyde Williams Field under the stars.

Students used to write musicals and perform them, but interest, as well as motivation, was quickly lost. In 1958, the plays were moved to Stephens Auditorium where the orchestra and actors could be heard due to the improved acoustics. The concerns of uncooperative weather were also alleviated by this relocation.

Abby Lund, junior in performing arts, said that this will be the third Stars Over Veishea event that she has been a part of. This year, Lund will play Yente, the matchmaker, and encourages everyone to see the play.

“It’s a very good funding opportunity for our department,” Lund said. “A lot of the older generation, like alumni, always like to come because they know Veishea just as well as everybody else, so I think it’s good because it brings back old community members.”

Brad Dell, assistant professor of music and theatre for Iowa State and director of the show, said they collaborated with the music department to provide unforgettable scores.

“There is approximately a 15-20 piece orchestra comprised of all music majors volunteering to do this,” Dell said.

When asked how plays were chosen for this long-standing tradition,

Dell said “We chose Fiddler because it’s a classic and it has universal appeal to people young and old. ... We’ve also been trying to alternate shows by doing a more contemporary type of a show one year and more of a classic show the next.”

Anson Woodin, senior in finance, is no newcomer to Stars Over Veishea, having played in last year’s production of “Rent” and the opera “Candide” last fall.

This year, he landed the lead role of Tevye, the father who is overly concerned with tradition and finding his daughters suitable husbands with the help of Yente.

“There are a lot of levels to this play, which is part of the reason as to why it’s been popular for so long. The biggest is that it revolves around family and the community.”

Woodin said there are many aspects that appeal in the play.

“You also have the aspects of oppression and hard times that they

Music

Guitarist Kelly Richey to perform at ISU

By Cole Komma
Ames247 writer

Kelly Richey comes from a time when the phrase “guitar hero” was born. When she first picked up a guitar, she said she felt she had to learn it. Now a seasoned player, she continues to push herself and squeal her guitar.

Kelly Richey will perform at 8 p.m. Thursday at the Maintenance Shop. Tickets are $7 for students and $12 for the general public with a $2 day-of-show increase.

Richey’s passion for music started at a young age. Her mother, a classically trained pianist, urged her to take lessons at a young age. In addition to piano, Richey added drumming to her list of skills.

“My dad said if I got rid of drums, he’d buy me anything I wanted,” Richey said. “So I asked for an electric guitar, which he thought would be a phase, but it wasn’t.”

Richey said choosing the guitar was part of her journey to find out who she was as a confused teenager.

“The guitar was kind of like a black box to me, it was sort of a mystery,” Richey said. “I was still trying to find myself as a teenager and it was powerful so I was intrigued by it. But because of the family I was raised in ... I didn’t know who Led Zeppelin was when I got an electric guitar. I honestly didn’t know who Jimi Hendrix was.”

To some guitar players, this may sound like blasphemy, but Richey’s reaction to Jimi Hendrix’s music is one shared by many.

“A friend of mine said to me, ‘What do you mean, you don’t know who Jimi Hendrix is?’ And then they played ‘And The Gods Made Love.’” And I was like, ‘Holy crap, what’s this?’” Richey said. “I had no idea a guitar could make that sound.”

Kelly Richey and her electric guitar are coming to Iowa State to play at the Maintenance Shop at 8 p.m. Thursday.

Jimmy Page, Richey immersed herself in the world of guitar. She practiced every day for up to 16 hours.

“I would take it to school with me,” Richey said. “They disconnected the outlets in my school in certain areas of the building so I wouldn’t plug my amp in.”

Within a year and half she had learned to play. Along the way, Richey was pushed to improve by her guitar teacher, Eddie Beckley.

“I think a great teacher identifies what their student needs to be pushed,” Richey said. “He identified how I learned, but he also learned that I was stubborn. ... He would push me.”

Richey also plays acoustic guitar, but the electric guitar takes her somewhere, she said.

“The electric guitar [allows] me to check out and go to that other world where reality disappears,” Richey said. “[That world] is the greatest relief I have every known. It’s magical.”

For years, Richey has tried to capture the energy of her live show in an album. With her new album, she believes her efforts have paid off.

“I’ve constantly been trying to figure out how to capture that live energy in a studio. And the new record I just put out, ‘Sweet Release,’ I believe I did that and I am so thrilled to be able to say that,” Richey said.

“We had the ability to put things back in the room where we could capture everything without any bleed and play live. It was as live as you could get in a studio. And in four days, the record was recorded.”

Music:
‘Paramore’

By Maggie McGinity

Paramore’s fourth studio album, self-titled “Paramore,” starts rocking early, but features a wide-range of music styles. Overall, “Paramore” is a fantastic album.

It flows from one song to another, 17 tracks in total, including three, which are fueled wonderfully with ukulele interludes, which contrast well with Hayley Williams’ voice and cutting, angry and sometimes sarcastic lyrics.

This would be a great album to play as background music at a party. All the songs are fun and easy to listen to.

My only complaint about this album is that it’s lacking a bit in coherence and overall album-theme.

The album’s current singles, “Now” and “Still Into You,” are excellent songs, well-chosen, with real Top 40 potential.

Game:
‘Hitman’

By Levi Castle

Semi-confusing story plot aside, “Hitman: Absolution” executes the stealth genre in a fun, exciting way.

Agent 47 is a quiet, ruthless killer who sees the world as one job after another. That is, until someone he cares about is involved.

This game has some of the best graphics I’ve ever seen; the lighting is particularly jaw-dropping and every environment feels so special and real.

The game says you are free to handle the missions however you want, but unless you are very stealthy and only take out the intended target, you will receive negative points.

Points are used to unlock upgrades for Agent 47. So you can’t really play the mission the way you want, because you won’t get the upgrades. Sounds like an absence of freedom to me.

Movie:
‘Evil Dead’

By Gabriel Stoffa

“‘The Evil Dead’ is being remade,” I said jubilantly. “I am so there at midnight!”

Despite my friends enjoying it, I wasn’t very into the 2013 remake of “The Evil Dead.” I highly applaud the use of make-up and prosthetics instead of CGI; that work is reason enough to see the new “Evil Dead” at some point.

However, the story, the actors and the “scary” stuff simply wasn’t there.

Besides a few cringes, the frightening parts, when people in the crowd jump and grab the person next to them, are not a factor.

If you like the gory movies where people are hacked apart, the new “Evil Dead” will certainly appease you.

All in all, it is probably a fine date movie worthy of a watch at some point.
